declared to be one of a band of twenty six "white slavers" operating in the which undoubtedly would result in the arrest of all the men involved.

Wallack had eight "slaves" in his imploy, each of whom was required to show earnings of $140 a week, half of which went to him. He told the police that some of the women in each of the "squads" used "knockout" drops as an aid in robbing their victims.

"In some cases the government has called upon those interested in a business to participate in the actual fixing of prices," says the statement. "This has resulted in a fixing of prices by negotiation—which is clearly harmful. In the judgment of the committee, men elected by an industry to represent it should be called upon by the government for full information which would be helpful in fixing prices, but the actual determination of the price should be a semi-judicial function."
